A- THE TEXT

① Every Wednesday morning, people in Portland, Oregon, go to their windows to watch a group of about 170 children ride their bikes, music trailing behind them. The onlookers cheer and take photos. "This brings so much joy to so many people," said Alison Warlitner, whose children attend Alameda Elementary School and join in the bike trip each week. "It's the coolest thing," she added.

③ Balto started the walking school bus project in 2016. The whole school was invited to join the ride, and about 75 students showed up. Given its success, it quickly became a weekly Wednesday ritual at the school, and by the end of the school year roughly 120 students were taking part each time. Now, more than 170 kids meet every Wednesday morning, ready to ride. Balto also contacted local cycling organizations, with the aim of offering bikes to students in need at other schools in the city.

One of the fundamental problems with teenagers and technology nowadays is the time they spend cooped up in a bedroom at home. They are hooked up to a tablet or laptop for (entertain), or with their heads bent over a small device. Teenagers no longer spend as much time outside in the fresh air as it used to be. That's mainly because they meet-up online. It's far (fashionable) to chat online than meet-up! Twenty years ago teens (spend) much more time outside and enjoying sporting activities rather than swiping through social media. Yes, times have changed (significant), however, that's not to say that our kids these days can't still enjoy the best of both worlds. What can you do as a parent to counterbalance this? There is simply no point in (remove) technology from your teen because you then enter the danger zone of excluding them from their friends. However, you can lay down some ground rules.
